INTRODUCTION

Atmospheric carbon dioxide currently stands at about 387 parts per million, and the science is clear: We must reduce atmospheric carbon dioxide to 350 parts per million or less to avoid climate catastrophe. Leading climate scientists who have called on world leaders to establish a target of 350 parts per million or less for CO<sub>2</sub> reduction include Rajendra K. Pachauri, Chair of the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change, and Dr. James Hansen, Chief Climate Scientist at NASA. Achieving that target will require the United States to cut its greenhouse gas emissions to 45 percent or more below 1990 levels by 2020.

Peer-reviewed studies have concluded that 35 percent of species could be committed to extinction by 2050 if current emissions trajectories continue. But many of these extinctions can be prevented if greenhouse gas emissions are cut.

To document the devastating effects of global warming on wildlife — and to dramatically illustrate the need to take action now — the Center for Biological Diversity has created a Web-based interactive installation profiling 350 species whose future survival depends on how we meet the challenge of reducing emissions today.

In fact, our inventory of 350 species includes one who stands to be tragically impoverished by the loss of so many others, but who holds the key to preventing climate catastrophe: ourselves, Homo sapiens sapiens.

The Web installation, titled 350 Reasons We Need to Get to 350: 350 Species Threatened by Global Warming, launched in tandem with the International Day of Climate Action October 24, 2009, and the project's interactive elements have amassed public response that now travels to Copenhagen for the United Nations Climate Change Conference in December 2009.

We've collected that citizen response in these pages, in the shape of more than 2,000 signatures on a petition to President Barack Obama — asking him to ensure that any new U.S. climate legislation or any international agreement negotiated in Copenhagen includes the goal of reducing atmospheric carbon dioxide to 350 parts per million or less — and hundreds of photos from Center for Biological Diversity supporters, sending world leaders the 350 message on behalf of individual species threatened with extinction due to global warming. Finally, we've included here a sampling of the plants and animals profiled by our Web installation itself, an extensive resource that will continue to evolve as part of our Climate Law Institute's fight to protect life on Earth — from polar bears to pteropods — from the climate crisis.

350 REASONS WE NEED TO GET TO 350: THE WEB SITE

Our project Web site inventories 350 species around the globe — large and small, iconic and unknown — whose very existence is threatened by global warming. From polar bears in Alaska, monk seals in Hawaii, Atlantic salmon in the Northeast, and sea turtles in Florida to corals throughout the world, each brief profile gives a snapshot of what mechanisms are being triggered to make a species' food web collapse or habitat become less livable. Descriptions and photos of the 350 plants and animals are searchable through an interactive regional map or a taxonomic portal. Following is a small sampling of the entries found at 350.biologicaldiversity.org.

Arctic fox (Alopex lagopus or Vulpes lagopus)

Range: Arctic regions of Europe, Asia, North America, Greenland, and Iceland

The Arctic fox is well adapted to survive in some of the coldest places on the planet — the Arctic tundra and Arctic sea ice. A slumbering Arctic fox in winter will wrap its long, bushy tail around its body for added warmth; the fox's feet are covered in dense fur to insulate against the cold and provide traction on the ice. As temperatures rise, the Arctic fox's tundra and sea-ice habitat is shrinking, its lemming prey are becoming less abundant, and it faces increased competition and displacement by the red fox, which is moving northward as temperatures warm and trees invade the tundra.

Panamanian golden frog (Atelopus zeteki)

Range: Endemic to west-central Panama

Ancient Panama legend promised luck to anyone who spotted the Panamanian golden frog — one of the world's harlequin frog species — in the wild. Unfortunately, that isn't possible today. In 2006, the frog-killing chytridiomycosis disease hit the species' native home, the clear streams of the volcanic crater of El Valle de Antón. This small, brightly colored frog — whose populations were already under pressure due to collectors and habitat loss — was decimated. Similar species still hop around in Panama's mountain forests, but now the only remaining Panamanian golden frogs are those bred in captivity at a handful of zoos.

The neotropical harlequin frogs in the genus Atelopus have declined more catastrophically than any other amphibian genus. Of 113 species, at least 30 have vanished in the past 25 years, and the populations of another 12 species have declined by 50 percent or more. Rising temperatures from climate change are thought to have played a role in these declines by promoting outbreaks of the infectious chytridiomycosis disease.

Humphead wrasse (Cheilinus undulatus)

Range: Throughout the Indo-Pacific oceans

With sumptuous, fleshy lips and a bulbous, protruding forehead, the humphead wrasse is an unforgettable fish. However, this enormous, colorful coral-reef dweller is slow to reproduce, making it vulnerable to overfishing. The species' total population has dropped by at least half in just 30 years. With concern mounting over sinking humphead wrasse populations, the trade in this species became regulated by the Convention of International Trade in Endangered Species — but the wrasse is still in danger. This fish depends on corals throughout its life. Tiny larval wrasse actively select branching hard and soft corals as their new home. Juveniles are found among thickets of dense branching corals, while adult wrasse inhabit a reef's outer slopes and steep drop-offs. The global warming- and ocean acidification-induced die-off of coral reefs is leaving coral-dependent fishes like the humphead wrasse without a home.

Southern rockhopper penguin (Eudyptes chrysocome)

Range: Southern Ocean Islands

The quintessential crested penguin, the southern rockhopper penguin was originally named for its propensity for jumping over obstacles. Like all penguins, the southern rockhopper faces a dire and immediate threat in the form of climate change. Scientists have linked increases in ocean temperature with large-scale declines in southern rockhopper penguin populations: an 80-percent decline on the Falkland Islands, a 60-percent decline on Marion Island, and 50- to 94-percent declines on three islands off

New Zealand. The continued warming and acidification of the Southern Ocean inhabited by the southern rockhopper penguin threaten to diminish its food supply, posing a profound threat to this species' survival.

Quino checkerspot butterfly (Euphydryas editha quino)

Range: Riverside and San Diego counties, California, and scattered areas in Baja California, Mexico

Once one of the most common California butterflies, historically the Quino checkerspot butterfly numbered in the millions and could be found throughout California and Mexico. Habitat destruction and rapid climate change together have severely reduced this butterfly's numbers. With increasing temperatures and drier conditions, the butterfly's range has undergone a large-scale shift northward and upward in elevation, as populations have gone extinct in the southern 100 miles of the species' range. Warmer temperatures and increasing drought conditions reduce butterfly growth rates and negatively affect host plants — lowering their density and their seasonal availability to butterflies.

Graham's penstemon (Penstemon grahamii)

Range: Uinta Basin in Carbon, Duchesne, and Uinta counties, Utah; Rio Blanco County, Colorado

The lovely, pale lavender flowers of the Graham's penstemon, with their magenta-striped throats and fiery orange inner parts, are quite remarkable in appearance. Also remarkable — and perilous — is the fact that this plant lives exclusively on oil shale in the Uinta Basin of northeastern Utah and northwestern Colorado, where oil, gas, and oil shale development threatens its very existence. A member of the figwort family, the penstemon is a small plant — only about eight inches tall — but it has surprisingly large flowers for its size. While the penstemon is uniquely adapted to live in the Southwest's harsh, dry climate, it requires a very specific type of shale substrate and can't simply shift northward through different soil types as global warming increases.

Leatherback sea turtle (Dermochelys coriacea)

Range: All tropical and subtropical oceans, as far south as the southernmost tip of New Zealand and as far north as the Arctic Circle

As ancient as the dinosaurs, leatherback sea turtles are the heaviest reptiles on the planet. In addition to longlines and gillnets, these remarkable creatures face the threat of global warming. Rising sea levels, increased sand temperatures, and stronger storms threaten the sandy beaches the turtles use to nest. Shifting currents may alter the ocean's upwelling patterns, which turtles depend on for food. And because turtles lack sex chromosomes, their genes don't determine whether a hatchling is male or female. Instead, buried eggs take their cue from the ambient temperature. With a mere two-degree increase over 29 degrees Celsius, a nest will produce all females — a few degrees higher, and eggs won't hatch at all. To maintain a viable breeding population, a cool, male-producing year must come at least once every five to 10 years.

TAKING ACTION FOR 350: THE PHOTOS

One of the 350 species featured in our 350 Reasons Web project is Homo sapiens sapiens. As our site notes, this Latin name for the modern human species — the mammal whose global population has surpassed 6.8 billion — means “wise man.” But besides facing impoverishment by the loss of thousands of our fellow species on planet Earth, we’ve also placed future generations of humans at grave risk by fueling rapid warming. Hope of turning the tide, and saving ourselves and other species from the catastrophic effects of climate change, rests with us and our capacity for problem solving, introspection, and yes, wisdom.

For that reason, as we compiled our extensive inventory of profiles and photos for the plants and animals threatened by global warming, we wanted this project to feature a powerful human element as well. We hoped that besides signing our petition to President Barack Obama in the days leading to his participation in Copenhagen climate talks, that our members and online activists would also find a personal connection with the 350 message. We encouraged those who viewed the project to send in their own images with that message, on behalf of a plant or animal that needs our help to curb global warming, and hundreds of people responded. This collection of images, posted on our project Web site and included in full on the following pages, is a poignant reminder that as we speak up to protect Earth’s non-human inhabitants from the harmful effects of climate change, we also speak for ourselves, our children, and our communities.

Clockwise from top: Dr. Jane Goodall joined us to send a message to world leaders heading to Copenhagen that chimpanzees — another primate threatened by global warming — need us to get to 350. Many children participated in our interactive photo project, and in a few cases, other species got into the act.

TAKING ACTION FOR 350: THE PETITION

In celebration of October's International Day of Climate Action and in preparation for President Barack Obama's participation in international climate negotiations in Copenhagen, the Center for Biological Diversity asked our members and online activists to urge political action for those species and for thousands of others at risk from runaway climate change. More than 2,000 supporters added their names to our petition calling upon President Obama to follow the science and support an emissions-reduction goal of 350 parts per million for any new U.S. legislation or negotiated international agreement.

Dear President Obama:

The scientific consensus is clear: We must reduce the level of atmospheric carbon dioxide to 350 parts per million (ppm) or below to avoid global catastrophe. While this is no doubt an ambitious goal, if we fail, life on Earth — including the polar bear, manatee, Atlantic salmon, caribou, and our own human race — faces a perilous future.

To date, proposed bills in the U.S. Congress have fallen far short of the 350 ppm goal. Please make sure that any legislation or negotiated agreement in Copenhagen to address the climate crisis sets a target to reduce atmospheric carbon dioxide to no more than 350 ppm. Any emission target that doesn't get the United States to 350 ppm or less won't be enough to save life on Earth as we know it.

Please show bold leadership in protecting all of our futures, and ensure that 350 parts per million is part of the climate legislations and agreements.
